In March 2016, NHS England announced ten pilot ‘healthy new town’ developments they would be working with to shape the health of local communities, and to rethink how health and care services can be delivered.

In the NHS Five Year Forward View a clear commitment was made to dramatically improve the population health and integrate health and care services as new places are built and take shape.

The Whyndyke Garden Village 92-hectare site includes the development of 1400 homes, the provision of a school, healthy community facilities, a health facility and employment land. It has been designated as a Healthy New Town by NHS England as a blueprint for communities of the future.

Work on the site is expected to start in 2017 with the view of reducing journeys to work, and giving the development a sustainable and independent community.
