Improving access to Higher Education for disabled students

Is there support for disabled learners studying in Higher Education?
Yes. School, Further Education and Higher Education providers all support SEN pupils / disabled learners but organise this support in different ways.

What happens to SEN in Higher Education?
Higher Education institutions do not use the term SEN, instead they use the term 'disabled students' that includes students with physical or sensory impairments, specific learning disabilities such as dyslexia, mental health difficulties such as depression, unseen disabilities or health conditions such as asthma, epilepsy and autistic spectrum disorders.

Summer Schools
Did you know that summer schools:
✓ are open to pupils on the SEN register?
✓ provide support for each person according to their individual learning and personal support needs?
✓ give young people a chance to find out what it is like living away from home?
✓ allow young people to learn about the support they would get with their learning?
✓ are available for pupils in years 10, 11 and 12?
✓ can be an ideal way of gaining confidence and developing independence
✓ give a taste of what it might be like to study in higher education?
✓ help young people to explore their options and future careers
✓ are available in all Higher Education Institutions and some Further Education Colleges in Lancashire?
✓ help young people decide what they might do when they leave school?

Higher Education providers are aware that many parents / guardians may have concerns about their son or daughter attending a summer school, especially if they have not stayed away from home before or have specific support needs. To help make sure summer schools cater for the needs of disabled learners the staff who organise summer schools talk to current disabled students and staff with responsibility for providing support for disabled learners to make sure that summer schools are appropriate for the needs of disabled learners.

Parents / guardians can play an important role in encouraging and supporting young people to attend a summer school by helping them to make sure they have all the personal and academic support they need. If you have any questions or want to find out more then contact the North West Summer School Office who will be happy to talk to you and put you in touch with local summer school staff:

Improving access to Higher Education for disabled students

University Life
Disabled students are entitled to a range of support in Further Education and Higher Education, and can successfully complete their studies at degree level. To get an 'insider view' of what student life might be like you can look at the following student accounts of studying at university.

http://www.bbc.co.uk/ouch/

But remember
Every student is different and so each person's experience will be unique and depend on where they study, what they study, where they live, what hobbies and interests they have and what they plan to do in the future.
